Stefan Kozlowski is a professional content developer, researcher, and analyst at expert-analysis.de. With a helping hand from his father and his fellow students, Stefan was able to replace the serial number on the hard drive. When the new number appeared on the hard drive, Stefan was able to make the drive capable again. Wired comments that at least six people at the meeting have access to wireless networks, but only two, Jeremy Epstein and Jeffrey Mark, had such high-level security clearances that they could install malware and change a serial number without anyone knowing. Mark showed reporters the hard drive he swiped, explaining that he was able to modify the hard drive serial number by adding, removing, or changing one or two digits. Nicknamed "Magebot," the malware allows hackers to access information, change account information, and steal login credentials through websites. Representatives of MacTel acknowledged that a portion of their call centers still use unsupported POTS connections and that additional staff would help to keep up with the growing demand for service. He also says that he and his associates have been "all over the place" for the past few months and have shipped software, hardware, and firmware directly to customers through the email addresses on his site. New York Times reporters submitted more than 60 separate requests to the FCC and AT&T asking for security or other information about the hacking of the network. AT&T officials provided a list of the domains used by those they say are responsible for disrupting the company's network, but told reporters that they aren't going after the individuals behind the attack. "[S]uch attacks should not take place in a public internet environment," AT&T spokesman Mark Siegel said. "We recognize that this has been unfortunate for customers." AT&T says the attack is limited to only those two customer centers. During the demonstration, Stiens said he was able to access an unsuspecting person's computer over the internet by using a variety of attack vectors — from port scanning to scanning for weak passwords. The police are now looking into the case to see if he was able to access information on other computers, but so far, all they have is a list of common login credentials like a person's name or phone number. These potential targets should "really rethink what they do with their passwords
