What's New in the PDF Creator Pilot?

PDF Creator Pilot is a library that was designed in order to provide people with the means to create PDFs with the preferred characteristics, from the aforementioned programming languages. In addition to its design capabilities, the library will allow one to open, visualize or merge PDF files. PDF security, font embedding and different sets of characters, coupled with document compression are also supported, this way providing users with a complete set of tools for manipulating PDF files. One will be able to add or delete document pages selectively, generate custom watermarks, apply them on the preferred pages or use and embed fonts in different formats. Experienced users will be able to create interactive PDF files with JavaScript or hyperlinks and the library also supports custom encryption and password protection for the generated PDF documents. Tree-structure layouts can also be created and manipulated and people can define and apply their own annotations. Some other features that are worth mentioning are the text extraction tool, which will allow one to extract the preferred text strings from the loaded PDF files and the creation of PDF documents "in memory", which can be useful for Web applications. HDC (Virtual Device Context) is also offered, this way people being able to draw on PDF pages using WinAPI functions and therefore add PDF generating features to other applications.1. Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to an architecture and methodology for remote control of logical devices via a single address. More particularly, the invention relates to the use of a set of commands implemented as a name to address identifier in a computer network. 2. Description of the Related Art Networks of computers are well known in the art. One such network is referred to as a Local Area Network (LAN). LANs are used in many types of application including offices, universities, company labs, and other places where a group of computers are associated together in order to work as a single, self-contained unit. LANs are particularly well suited for applications requiring a large number of computers, such as image processing applications, database management applications, and the like. Although LANs may be connected to a larger network such as a Wide Area Network (WAN), this is not required, and a

LAN may be connected to other LANs through a technique referred to as sub-network technology. In many cases, it is desirable for computers in a LAN to be configured in a manner so that the computers can share resources among each other. A resource which is commonly shared is data stored in a database. For example, the same data may be stored in each of the computers, but one computer, when requested, will retrieve the data from the database and the data will be made available to the other computers. The computer which stores the data in the database is referred to as the host computer, and the computer that receives the data from the host computer is referred to as the slave computer. Generally, the host computer sends
